

Faith. The fire crew quickly attacked the flames, and soon it was possible to see that there were two occupants of the aircraft. The unconscious pilot was pulled out of the burning wreckage with little delay, but the navigator, who was fully conscious, was still trapped. Leading Aircraftman Dorey, a member of the fire crew who had already worked valiantly in the task of controlling the fire and rescuing the pilot, climbed on to the fuselage and, despite the obvious danger of imminent explosion and the extreme discomfort from the flames and smoke, held the navigator as far away from the flames as he could. This he did to the limit of his physical strength, thus enabling the Medical Officer more easily to administer to the injured man and finally effect his removal from the wreckage. Leading Aircraftman Dorey thereupon collapsed from the effects of the smoke and his almost superhuman exertion and fell into the wreckage, from which he had to be dragged by his comrades. His magnificent conduct was largely responsible for the navigator being rescued alive; unfortunately he died subsequently in hospital.
